OVERVIEWFlorence, 18 March 2011

At first glance, the rejection of the Constitutional Treaty by the majority of the French and Dutch voters, and the Irish "No" to the Reform Treaty (RT), may give the impression of an inescapable constitutional crisis for Europe.

Although the RT does not include any reference to the word "Constitution", the substantial continuity between this document and the Constitutional Treaty is evident. As some scholars have stressed, a "constitutional substance" would have been "rescued" despite the elimination of some "dirty words" such as "Constitution", "Law", and "Minister" from the text of the Lisbon Treaty (Ziller 2008). From this point of view, as Corthaut points out, "the Reform Treaty looks more like the (evil?) twin of the Constitutional Treaty than its distant cousin" (Corthaut 2008). Ziller argues that the possible major changes (the primacy clause's disappearance, for example) were just functional to overcome the risk of Member States' refusal. Despite this substantial relative continuity, other authors have stressed the sense of disappointment which would characterise the document, defining it as a (mere) "Postconstitutional Treaty".

The real issue thus concerns the nature of a potential Constitution for Europe: what kind of Constitution would it be? Would the idea of a Constitution as such be applicable to the European Union experience? Has the season of the mega constitutional politics ended? Should we be "satisfied" with the Reform Treaty, by limiting ourselves to the maintenance of what we got after the rejection of the Constitutional Treaty?

This workshop tries to provide an answer to this question, reading the current phase from two very different perspectives: according to the first one, the Reform Treaty will represent just a phase, another link in the chain of the semi-permanent revision of the Treaties. According to the second perspective, the Reform Treaty is a good basis for the EU and no other constitutional phases are possible after the "constitutional failure": the real issue is the implementation of the Reform Treaty (rather than its overcoming) or its "maintenance".

Given the highly interdisciplinary content of the subject of this workshop, we decided to extend the invitation to political scientists and lawyers (experts in EU and public international law, comparative and European constitutional law). All the speakers invited will provide a very interdisciplinary overview of the subject.
